Let's Get Out of the Breakfast Rut (1)

Who decided breakfast had to be the same dreary thing week in and week out? Let's start the day on the upbeat by glamorizing that most neglected meal of the day.

Your rut may be no breakfast at all or coffee and a sweet roll. In that case, consider the following facts, established by extensive tests and experiments:

Children do better in school, workmen have fewer accidents, housewives avoid midmorning fatigue when they have eaten a well-balanced breakfast. It should include: Fruit and/or fruit juice; milk; whole grain cereal (preferrably cooked rather than cold) and/or toast. White bread and refined cereals lack the fiber and some of the essential nutrients—especially the B vitamins—originally found in the grain. Adding sugar increases the likelihood of vitamin B deficiency.

This is a bare minimum or starting point. But admittedly it can get monotonous so next week we will make some specific suggestions for varying the breakfast menu. There is no more reason to eat the same thing for breakfast every day than there is for any other meal.

Some of you are saying, "but I'm not hungry in the morning." This is usually the result of eating too late and too heavily the evening before. A light supper and nothing more until morning is the ideal for health. If you must have something, make it a piece of fruit which will digest quickly and leave your stomach empty, ready to rest through the night. You'll sleep better and be ready to start the new day with breakfast to provide energy for your activities.

If you are not in the habit of eating anything in the morning, you may need to start gradually and work up to a substantial meal.
